PREFACE.

Occupation Abstract.

THE third volume of our Abstract contains an alphabetical arrangement of all the occupations carried on by the inhabitants of this kingdom, of whatever age or sex, on the 7th of June, 1841, from the personal communications of each individual or head of a family. There are separate returns (distinguishing the sex, and whether above or under 20 years of age) for every county in Great Britain and for all the larger towns, and these are afterwards combined for England and Wales, for Scotland, and for Great Britain generally.

The difficulties attendant upon making such an abstract of the occupations of the people of this kingdom, will not perhaps at first occur to persons who see it arranged in its present easy form of reference for all: when stated, however, they will at once account for the time and labour required for its completion. Upon the only former occasion when a return of occupations was made, certain lists, which were supposed to embrace all the trades then carried on, were furnished to the different overseers, to be by them filled up with the number of males upwards of 20 years old in each parish or place who were employed in retail trade, or in handicraft, as masters, shopmen, journeymen, apprentices, or in any capacity requiring skill in the business, while there was reserved to them the liberty of adding the names of such additional occupations as were not included in their lists. It will be seen that by this mode the tabular arrangement with the proper numbers so engaged was complete for each parish or place at the time these lists were returned by the overseers, and therefore easily arranged or combined so as to exhibit totals for counties or for towns.

The objection to this plan, however, was, that there was a want of uniformity in the apportionment and designation of occupations not included in those lists, and that as to the correctness of that part of the classification which was left to the discretion of the overseers, no adequate test could be afterwards applied. As the lists of 1831 refer to males only of the age of 20 years and upwards, great care must be observed in using them as a test of the comparative increase of different trades or pursuits in the various localities within the last decennial period. In illustration of the differences of system to which we have alluded we reprint (at p. 27) from the Abstract of 1831 the accounts of the persons engaged in trade and handicraft as applicable to Great Britain generally, and to the assumed limits of the Metropolis at that period (p. 46), together with our Summary of Occupations for Great Britain, and an account which we have prepared for the Metropolis as existing in 1841 (p. 48), the limits of which, although rather more extensive than those comprised in the account for 1831, will not cause such a variation as materially to affect the comparison. Upon the present occasion, instead of circulating lists to contain by anticipation every existing trade or calling, the enumerator was directed to insert each man's description of himself opposite his name, so that when the enumerators' schedules were returned to us we might arrange the whole upon such form as should be most easy of reference. The result was, that many occupations were returned that will not be found in the list of 1831, while in the instance of important manufactures minute subdivisions of labour were separately entered in the schedules, showing both the attention with which this part of their duty was performed by the enumerators, and the absolute necessity for after combination upon some uniform system. In the cotton manufacture alone of the county of Lancaster, there were more distinct heads of labour inserted in the enumerators' schedules (some of them identical, some of them merely indications of the immense subdivision that here exists) than the whole number of occupations of every kind that had in 1831 been allotted to that county. The total number of different terms, all of which finally had to be transferred to the head of cotton, amounted originally to 1255, while the whole number of distinct occupations returned for Great Britain in 1831 amounted only to 598.

Some difficulty was found in arriving at the numbers respectively employed in the manufacture of the principal textile fabrics, owing to the immense variety of designations given to the various subdivisions of labour, some of them being common to more than one fabric, such as winder, piecer, &c. This difficulty was met, however, by a careful reference to the prevailing manufacture of the districts in which they were enumerated, and, where necessary, by actual inquiries. We have just stated that the different titles under which the various persons employed in cotton manufacture for Lancashire were returned, amounted to 1255: these, for the convenience of publication, and in order to render them accessible to an ordinary enquirer, we have reduced in the county abstracts to the general heading of "Cotton manufacture, all branches." If we had published the numbers under the different subdivisions returned to us, not only would reference to other matters have been rendered more difficult by the alphabetical list being immensely extended, but those who wished to arrive at general results would have been deceived by omitting to notice branches of the manufacture with which nothing but a scientific knowledge of details could have made them acquainted.

For the woollen manufacture of the West Riding of Yorkshire, 117 different subdivisions of labour were returned to us, including such general terms as carders, rovers, setters, cleaners, and winders, as well as technical terms, such as billy-piecers, raisers, shoddy-teazers, stretchers, dryers, &c.

In the cotton manufacture, the designations common to those employed upon other textile fabrics, such as sliverers, slubbers, devillers, sweepers, piecers, &c., were mixed up with those more peculiar to this branch, such as batters, scutchers, scavengers, &c. If these had been returned separately in the alphabetical index, they would have been either overlooked or confounded with the trade or calling from which these subdivisions of labour have borrowed such terms as scavenger, sweeper, &c.

With respect to trades, we should mention that the numbers opposite to such trades as bakers, butchers, haberdashers, &c., do not represent (as is the case with commercial directories) only the total number of shops of these respective denominations, but also include all persons (distinguishing age and sex) who are employed in these particular trades. It is evident, however, that such a mode of return furnishes an exact idea of the relative importance in a social point of view of each trade, and gives more correctly the amount of business in each locality, inasmuch as the number of hands employed is a better test upon these points than could be furnished by a mere statement of the number of shops open.

In some cases the accuracy of returns of this kind has been impugned, in consequence of the small numbers returned as engaged in making or selling articles of very general consumption. Thus, the assertion that any large place contains but one spectacle-maker, two pork-butchers, three coffin-makers, or four hatters, has been quoted as incorrect or ridiculous; whereas it should be borne in mind, that only in places of such importance and commercial activity as to require and support great subdivision of trades, would any such occupations be separately carried on at all. In many small country towns, the spectacle-maker would merge in the optician, who would perhaps be also the watch-maker, the barometer-seller, and the bell-hanger of his neighbourhood. The coffin-maker would be doing the last offices to his former customers in the cabinet-making line; while the hatter would figure in the list as draper, grocer, bookseller, or shopkeeper, according as he might prefer one name to the other.

With respect to the term "Independent," we should premise that the numbers included under that head are not merely the wealthy, or even those in easy circumstances, but all who support themselves upon their own means without any occupation. It will, therefore, afford no test of the relative amount of wealthy persons in different localities, or throughout Great Britain, as while it includes in the more rural districts many poor widows or aged men living upon their savings, it omits many large capitalists who are returned under their proper heads in the list of "Occupations."

The return "Other Persons" includes many who, there is reason to believe, escaped enumeration upon other occasions, inasmuch as it comprises 22,303 persons ascertained to have been sleeping in barns, tents, pits, and in the open air, on the night of the 6th June, 1841. Of the occupations of these persons it was obviously impossible to procure any account, although we have been able to distribute them under the columns of sex and age. The same may be said of the 5,016 persons enumerated as travelling by night at the time the Census was taken.

The "Residue" of the population whose occupations are entirely unaccounted for amounts to 10,991,382, which would at first appear to be a large proportion. It must however be remembered, that this comprehends both sexes and all ages; and it will be found, upon examination, that of this number only 2½ per cent. are males above 20 years of age. The males under 20, and the females above and under 20, make up respectively about 31, 32, and 33 per cent. of the remainder. For the large number under 20 of each sex, without any occupation, it is obviously easy to account, comprehending, as it does, infants and children of tender age. The number of women above 20 years of age, without any occupation returned, consists generally of unmarried women living with their parents, and of the wives of professional men or shopkeepers, living upon the earnings but not considered as carrying on the occupations of their husbands. The small number of males above 20 years of age who have been returned by the Enumerators as not pursuing any occupations (nor as being persons of independent means, nor as paupers), amounting to 272,732, in a population of 18,655,981 souls (a proportion of only 1·46 per cent.), may be supposed to consist of sons who continue to reside with their parents, and perhaps to assist in their business, without being returned as carrying on the same trades; of husbands supported by the labour and industry of their wives; and of persons temporarily out of employment.

We do not think any further observations will be necessary for the correct comprehension of that portion of these Returns which is comprised in the Alphabetical Lists which form the bulk of this Volume.

Before proceeding to explain the reasons and the nature of the classification which we have attempted of the Occupations of the people of this Kingdom, we would shortly notice the effect which the increased or diminished preponderance of the two great classes, viz., the Manufacturing and Agricultural, may be supposed to have upon the vital statistics of this kingdom. It must be obvious that there is not any point connected with this important science, whether it be the space or the house accommodation enjoyed by its inhabitants, their mortality or fecundity, the rate of their natural or ascertained increase, nor, indeed, any other question of a similar nature, which is not directly or indirectly affected by the proportion which the Agricultural bears to the other great division of the community. To illustrate this subject, and in order to show the mutual bearing of the information furnished in our present and former returns upon those of the Registrar-General, we have prepared the following Table. The views suggested by each of these publications are so intimately connected, and so curiously illustrate each other, that we thought such a Table would be useful, in which the eye could range from one fact to the other, as applicable to each county in England, to North and South Wales, and to England and Wales generally.

* As per Annual Report of the Registrar-General for 1843.

A few words of explanation as to each column may facilitate the comprehension of the mass of figures embraced by this Table.

Column 1 gives the number of inhabitants to every hundred acres for each county, and exhibits a state of things which alternately results from, or is a cause of, the different facts exhibited by the other columns. In counties where the inhabitants are employed not only in cultivating the natural products of the surface, as in the purely agricultural districts, but in modifying by various manufacturing processes the raw products of other regions, and extracting the treasure that lies concealed beneath the surface of our own, the number of inhabitants within a given space must be expected to be greater: thus it will be seen that while Hereford would furnish only 20 inhabitants to every 100 acres, Lincolnshire 21, Rutland 22, and the North Riding of Yorkshire but 15, Stafford would show 67, Chester 58, the West Riding of Yorkshire 70, Lancaster 147, and Middlesex 873.

The greater crowding of the inhabitants is by some supposed necessarily to lead to a greater number of marriages, of births, and of deaths.* Columns 2, 3, and 4, supply particulars on this head, by which the extent or universality of this consequence may be tested. It has, however, and with great appearance of plausibility, been urged, that no excessive mortality can be inferred until due allowance has been made for the excess of infant lives, which must, by a natural consequence, greatly swell the amount of deaths; column 5, therefore, has been added, in order to furnish for each county the proportion under five years of age in every 10,000 inhabitants.

In balancing the number of births against the inhabitants of any given division, a great error is committed unless due reference be had to the proportions there residing of a marriageable age, that is to say, between the years most likely to increase the population. Columns 6, 7, 8, and 9, give therefore the very varying numbers of each sex between 20 and 30, and between 30 and 40 years of age, in each of the counties of England; and in order not to omit the influence which a large preponderance above the usual age of marriage may be supposed to possess, column 10 contains a similar account of those above 50. It will thus be seen, that while Dorset would have, to every 20,000 inhabitants, 3200 of both sexes between 20 and 30 years of age, Monmouth would have 4000, and Middlesex rather more. On the other hand, the North Riding of York would furnish 3400 above 50; while the proportion of that age in Lancashire to the same numbers would not amount to 2200.

Column 11 shows the state of inhabited house-accommodation throughout England, a matter of no slight influence on the comfort, health, and habits of the population, ranging as it does from 2080 down to only 1100 houses to 10,000 inhabitants.

As we are now approaching the column which furnishes our account of the actual decennial increase of the population and its local distribution, we have thought it right to precede it by a tabular view, in columns 12, 13, and 14, of the number of persons born out of the several counties, in order to exhibit correctly the large influence which immigration has upon the account of the actual increase furnished in column 15.

To this we have added, in column 16, from the Registrar-General's Report for 1841, a statement of what would apparently have been the increase, supposing it had been influenced merely by natural causes, viz., by the excess of births over deaths. It will be seen, by comparing these two columns, which are placed side by side, that in counties in which the greatest apparent increase has taken place, according to our return, the real increase from the natural causes to which we have alluded has been very little above that for all England; while in other counties, in which the actual numbers have remained very nearly stationary for 10 years, the births have, in each year, far exceeded the deaths, and the surplus population has been apparently drained off to other localities by immigration.

It will not fail to be remarked, that the result of this comparison for all England is, that while the ascertained increase is nearly 14½ per cent., the natural increase at the present rate would appear to be not quite 10 per cent. in ten years. As this difference can, of course, in no way be accounted for by immigration from county to county, there appear to be only three modes of resolving the difficulty, each of which, or all combined in various degrees, may be adopted for that purpose. 1st. The immigration into England from Ireland and Scotland may be greater than the emigration from England to the colonies. In support of this it may be remarked, that the ascertained increase for Scotland is much less than that for England; and that this is still more the case with the Returns for Ireland, although there is no reason to suppose that the natural increase is in the same ratio less,—a point upon which no certain decision can be formed for want of a civil registry of births, deaths, and marriages in those parts of the United Kingdom similar to that in force for England and Wales. 2nd. The difference shown by the result of this table may be caused by the registry of births being more defective than that of deaths. Many reasons may be suggested why this should be the case,—the most obvious being that of illegitimate births, where numerous motives concur for avoiding registration if possible, while the registrar is less likely to be able to detect the omission. Indeed it is so well known that the registry of births was very greatly deficient in 1838, that on this account that year has not been brought into calculation in this table, as far as regards the births. The third reason that may be assigned why the excess of births over deaths, as shown in the last four years, should not, when spread over 10 years, furnish the increase exhibited by the Census Returns, is, that the increase might have gone on at a greater rate during the former than it did in the latter portion of the decennial period. There is no doubt that the period immediately preceding that at which the Census was taken was one of considerable depression in almost every branch of industry, and that the distress thereby engendered may have unduly increased the mortality, and therefore lowered the rate of natural increase, cannot be denied.

Columns 17, 18, and 19, furnish for both sexes an account of the comparative prevalence of early marriages for every county of England, and will perhaps cause some surprise from its not exhibiting that excess of imprudence upon this point, in the busy seats of commercial activity, that might have been expected. Indeed, with one or two exceptions, the agricultural counties take the lead in this particular.

Columns 20, 21, and 22, while they profess to give merely the number of persons of both sexes who signed the marriage register with marks, may be considered to present a fair criterion of the state of education in every county of England, inasmuch as those signing the marriage register would embrace all ranks and classes from the age at which education (at least elementary education) is generally completed.

Columns 23 and 24 are intended to illustrate the statistics of infant mortality in different localities. A mere account of the proportionate number of infant deaths to the total population must necessarily be deceptive and lead to incorrect conclusions, if made a test of the comparative prevalence or extent of infant mortality—inasmuch as where there are more infants born to the total population, even supposing the rate of infant mortality were equal, there must necessarily be also more infant deaths. A mere statement of the total number of deaths must also be deceptive as an index of the general mortality, if no reference be made to the excess of infant mortality. These two columns are intended to test the extent of both these influences, and to guard against either of these errors. The former contrasts the total number of registered infant deaths within a year, with the births registered within the same period. The second shows the proportion which the infant deaths bear to the general mortality.

The next three columns (25, 26, and 27) show the same facts as are exhibited in 2, 3, and 4, but in a different form, and it was considered convenient to append them here for the sake of more easy comparison with the columns immediately preceding them.

We have throughout this table given the results in proportions and per centages, and not in absolute numbers, because the limits of the counties referred to in the Census Returns and in the Registration Abstracts are not identical. This want of identity will not however be of so great importance where comparative proportions merely are noticed. Still it is evident, that as we often find neighbouring counties varying very much in the mortality attributable to each, the transfer of large numbers from one to another must to a certain degree affect these variances.

Lastly, in columns 28 and 29 are given proportional tables of the two great classes of occupations, viz., Agricultural, and Commercial (or Trade and Manufactures). In the former are included all farmers, graziers, nurserymen, &c., together with the whole number of persons returned as agricultural labourers; in the latter, all shopkeepers and manufacturers, with those working under them; while from both classes are excluded those returned as domestic servants or general labourers, together with all professional persons. It will be seen, that for all England trade and manufacture includes rather more than double the numbers included under the head of agriculture. The agricultural class forms not quite 8 per cent. of the whole population, while trade and manufacture employ $16\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. The proportions of course vary very much in the different counties; and it may be a curious study to view these variations in connexion with the facts exhibited by the preceding columns, in each of which the effects of those variations may be more or less traced. The greatest difference occurs in Lancashire and Middlesex, in which the manufacturing and trading column includes respectively 28 and 20 per cent. of the whole population, and the agricultural only 3 and 1 per cent. respectively. The difference between the two classes is least in the counties of Bedford, Dorset, Hertford, Norfolk, Northampton, Salop, and Southampton, in all of which the division is very nearly equal. The only counties in which the per centage engaged in agriculture greatly exceeds that employed in trade and commerce, are the counties of Essex, Hereford, Huntingdon, Lincoln, and Rutland; and in none of these does the difference amount to $6\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; while the excess in the columns of trade and manufactures ranges from 10 per cent. up to 25 per cent. in the counties of Chester, Derby, Lancaster, Leicester, Middlesex, Nottingham, Stafford, Warwick, and the West Riding of York.

The altered proportion which the agricultural bears to the commercial classes for Great Britain generally, will at first perhaps excite surprise. The proportions which the agricultural, the commercial, and the miscellaneous classes bore to each other, were, in

while they were respectively in

It should be noticed that these comparative statements refer in the three first decennial periods to families, but upon the present occasion to individuals. The latter mode gives a more accurate view of the amount of employment afforded in each division of labour; but inasmuch as there are rather more of the younger branches of a family employed in trade and manufactures than in agriculture, it may have slightly augmented the difference here exhibited. The other facts shown by these returns are however so much in accordance with these results as to confirm their accuracy. The increase of the population generally in the agricultural counties is very small, while in the manufacturing and mining seats of industry it far exceeds that of England generally.

It is also obvious, that while the natural limits of the extent of land in cultivation must restrict the numbers returned as cultivating it, the unlimited nature of the supplies afforded of the produce of other countries must make the extent of demand the only measure of the number of hands that may be employed commercially in converting the raw material into the articles required for clothing or luxury, and in disposing of them, when converted, among home and foreign customers. So also the extent of surface is no test of the depth to which the labours of the enterprising miner may be directed; and it is a curious fact that in some counties there are more labourers employed in bringing up and rendering available the hidden treasures concealed below, than can be profitably employed in cultivating the surface.*

The total number of agricultural labourers in Great Britain, of both sexes, amounts (as will be seen in the Classification) to 1,138,563, being the largest number returned under any one head, except domestic servants, who amount to 1,165,233.† It is a curious fact, that the total number of both sexes included under these two heads is, in localities varying much as to other circumstances, pretty nearly the same. It must be matter for congratulation that so large a number of females as 908,825 should be comprehended in a class in which habits of steady industry, of economy, and of attention to the maintenance of good character are so necessary as that of domestic service.

Of tradesmen and handicraftsmen, by far the largest number are included under the head of boot and shoemakers, amounting in the whole to 214,780, or nearly one-third more than the butchers, bakers, buttermen, milkmen, grocers, and greengrocers put together.

It was important to ascertain correctly the numbers employed upon the staple articles of manufacture of this kingdom, inasmuch as in the absence of any official Returns upon this point (except those of the Factory Commissioners), the estimates of persons qualified to judge and to arrive at correct conclusions have varied very greatly. The numbers employed in and about the manufacture of cotton have been estimated much beyond, and as far below the truth. It will be seen by the following table (p. 16) that the actual number, including men, women, and children, returned under that head, amounts to 302,376.

To the numbers included strictly under the head of cotton manufacture, might be added as employed upon this fabric in its more advanced stages most of those here returned under the head of "lace" and "hose;" if to these be added the fair proportion of those who appear under the general heads of weavers, spinners, and factory-workers (fabric not specified), we may fairly assume the numbers to whom the cotton manufacture furnished employment in Great Britain was near upon half a million in June 1841. And this, be it remembered, was a period of great depression in this branch of trade, and when many large establishments were closed.

In order to give a general view of the relative importance of the different staple manufactures with reference to the number of hands employed, we have prepared the following table, in which we have allotted to each fabric its fair proportion of the total number of persons here returned under the general appellation of weaver, spinner, and factory-worker, (fabric not specified):—

* In the county of Durham the number of miners is nearly double that of the labourers employed in the cultivation of the surface.

† We have reason to believe that, in some instances, servants kept in farm-houses, and employed generally about the premises, have been returned as domestic servants, whereas in 1831 such persons were included as agricultural labourers. Our directions were very precise on this point, as all farm-servants were to be returned as agricultural labourers; still, we believe, that a want of proper attention to this direction has, in the agricultural counties, increased the return of domestic servants and diminished that of agricultural labourers. The cause here alluded to will account for there being on the face of the returns a slight decrease in the number of persons engaged in agriculture as compared with 1831, whereas we believe the fact to be (after making due allowance for the circumstance above stated) that there has been a small increase.

It is gratifying to see that the returns as to sex and age will afford consolation to those who have regretted the supposed preponderance of the weaker sex and of more tender youth in the number of persons employed in these manufactures. Under the head of cotton manufacture (all branches), comprehending, as we have already mentioned, 302,376 persons, the males above 20 years of age are more than double the number under 20, and considerably exceed the total number of females above 20 years of age, who, in their turn, exceed by a third the females under 20. It is also an additional satisfaction to add, that the proportion of very young persons employed appears to be progressively diminishing, as the last detailed returns on this subject, viz., those furnished by the Factory Commissioners, show a continued improvement in this respect.

In 1835 the number of persons under 13 years of age employed in factories upon the four staples of cotton, wool, silk, and flax, amounted to 55,455, and were reduced in 1839 to 33,566, being a reduction of 21,889, although the numbers employed of all ages had increased from 355,373 to 423,626, showing a transfer of employment from the young to the old, and that this could be done with a considerable extension instead of entailing a diminution of the business carried on.

So lately as January 15, 1844, Mr. Saunders, Inspector of Factories for the Yorkshire district, says the increase in the number of young persons and adults is greater than in the number of children. Mr. Howell, in his report for the same quarter, p. 18, for the Cheshire and Midland Counties, says it might be worthy of notice, that the few factories in which children under 13 years of age continue to be employed, are chiefly isolated in rural districts or in non-manufacturing towns. Mr. Saunders, in his report for the quarter preceding, gives a very favourable view of the proportionate increase of numbers as follows:—

Total numbers employed in 1833 . . .	95,000
Ditto . . . . 1843 . . .	106,500
Increased number . .	11,500

The proportion in which this increase is divided among the three classes recognized by the Factory Act, viz., adults or persons above 18 years of age, young persons or those between 13 and 18, and children under 13 years of age, is as follows:—

Increase of adults	12,000
Ditto of young persons	1,500
	13,500

which is reduced to the actual increase, namely, 11,500, by a positive decrease in the number of children amounting to 2,000.

It may then be inferred that the expression of public opinion and the judicious interference of the legislature have not been without their effect. In the woollen manufacture the number of adult males employed is three times as great as that of the adult females, while the number of either sex under 20 years of age is comparatively small: the same may be said of the hose, but in the flax and linen manufactures the preponderance is not quite so great. In silk the numbers of both sexes employed are nearly equal, the excess among adults being with the males, and under 20 with the females. The manufacture of lace is the only one in which the number of females is very much greater than that of males; and here no one can be surprised at finding that the touch of a female hand is preferred in a material so fragile and delicate.

The return "Weavers, spinners, and factory workers (fabric not specified)," exhibits the same state of things. The males are, in round numbers, 99,000; the females, 63,000; adults of both sexes, above twenty years of age, 122,000; under twenty, 40,000. It will not fail to be remarked that the term "under 20" (which is the classification we were desired to make), comprehends many to whom the objections against infant labour can by no means be applied. The total number of persons employed upon the textile fabrics, forming the staple manufactures of the country, may be stated at 453,381 males, and 346,865 females. Those above 20 years of age, of both sexes, may be put at 555,191; those under twenty, at 245,055.

It will be seen that the number of persons employed under ground in mines amounts to 193,825, being nearly equal to an eighth of the total numbers employed in the cultivation of the surface. Of these by far the largest proportion, namely, 118,233, are returned as engaged in coal mines, and only 10,949 in iron mines. It must be remembered, however, that these two minerals run in close neighbourhood together, and are worked more or less constantly with reference to the extent of the demand, so that the same men are transferred from time to time to one or the other. At the period of the Census there was considerable depression in the iron trade, while it was taken just at the period when the larger coal-merchants throughout the kingdom were laying in their stocks, and when the carrying trade for sea-borne coal was most active. This will in some degree account for a greater disproportion than might otherwise have been expected in these two branches. It should also be noticed that there are 31,173 persons returned under the general head of miners, who would most likely represent many usually employed in iron mines, but temporarily out of employ. The manufacture of iron from the raw material gives employment to nearly 30,000 persons.

The potteries and the large glass manufactories support, it will be seen, a population of 32,200, in the proportions of 24,600 and 7,600, and are principally carried on in the counties of Stafford, Worcester, Salop, Derby, Northumberland, and in the West Riding of York.

The manufacture of gloves is principally carried on by females, and, according to our returns, embraces in all not quite 10,000 persons; it is more particularly pursued in the counties of Leicester, Nottingham, Oxford, and Worcester.

The manufacture of engines and machines, which of course varies in activity and extent with the general activity of trade and manufacture, is daily increasing in importance from the demands upon it made by the railways extending in every direction. There are 16,550 persons returned as employed upon this important branch, comprehending the most intelligent and best paid of persons, both as masters and handicraftsmen.

We are fully alive to the difficulty of adopting any mode of scientific classification which would give general satisfaction. It is for this reason that in the counties and large towns, where we had to distinguish age and sex, we restricted ourselves to an alphabetical arrangement which would give to all, by very simple combinations, the opportunity of making for themselves any arrangement they might prefer. There is so much difference of opinion as to the strict bounds of productive and unproductive labour, and upon every other element of scientific division, that, in almost any classification we could have adopted, we should have been considered by many to have gone on wrong principles, and to have committed errors of which the extent could not be either tested or corrected. Even for England and Wales, for Scotland, and for Great Britain generally, in the Classification (see Table facing p. 52) which we have thought it right to furnish, in order to give comparative results we have preferred keeping to the general terms used in ordinary parlance, giving the totals engaged in trade and manufacture, in agriculture, in military and naval pursuits, in the learned professions, in other employments of the educated of both sexes, in general manual labour, in the civil service of the Government, in parochial offices, and in domestic service. These, with the independent and the residue, both which latter terms have been already alluded to, and the accidental classes of paupers, lunatics, almspeople, and prisoners, exhaust the total population of this kingdom. We have supplied a key or Table (p. 53), showing in detail the occupations of persons included under each head in this classification, so that any person by referring to it may deduct from the totals given the number contributed by any particular head of occupation which he thinks misplaced in the class to which we have assigned it.

We would willingly have given a classification of the occupations of the inhabitants of Great Britain into the various wants to which they respectively minister, but in attempting this we were stopped by the various anomalies and uncertainties to which such a classification seemed necessarily to lead, from the fact that many persons supply more than one want, though they can only be classed under one head. Thus, to give but a single instance,—the farmer and grazier may be deemed to minister quite as much to clothing by the fleece and hides as he does to food by the flesh of his sheep and cattle.

One advantage in the classification we have here adopted, and which was not without its influence upon our decision, is, that by a combination of some of the classes which we have here kept distinct, we are enabled to present the following comparative statement of the numbers included under each of the classes that were separately distinguished in the year 1831, and the same classes in 1841:—

COMPARATIVE STATEMENT of the Occupations of Males Aged 20 Years and upwards, enumerated in Great Britain, in the Years 1831 and 1841.

‡ The total of Males in 1841 whose occupations are unaccounted for is, in fact, only 276,868, as it includes the following persons, who amount together to 115,343; viz. Males twenty years of age in the Government Civil Service 16,049, Parochial Police and Law Officers 22,942, Almspeople, Pensioners, Paupers, Lunatics, and Prisoners 73,539, and Army and Navy (Half-pay) 2,813.

As we feel that for the purpose of comparing the state of facts exhibited by different districts, or that shown by the whole kingdom at different periods, a mere statement of the numbers comprehended under each head in our classification is insufficient, we have prepared tables which should exhibit the comparative numerical importance of each class upon the principle of per centages, the only convenient mode for such a purpose. We have made the calculation upon two principles;—first, upon the total occupations returned; and, secondly, upon the whole population. The former shows the relative numerical importance of one industrial class as compared with all the others, the latter as compared with the whole population.

PREFACE.

Although we have in our general classification combined under one head trade and manufacture, yet in the following table we have attempted to separate them in order to show the numbers they respectively embrace. In going through every occupation contained in our list for this purpose, we have felt the great difficulty of making such a division satisfactorily; we have therefore given (at p. 58) the names of all occupations included under each division exhibited in the following Abstract, in order to leave the opportunity of correction to those who differ from the view taken by us.

ABSTRACT distinguishing, as far as possible, the Number (with the Age and Sex) of Persons engaged in Commerce and Trade, from those engaged in Manufacture.

We thought it not unimportant to obtain, where feasible, returns of the former occupations pursued by persons who at the time of the Census were inmates of workhouses, of hospitals, of gaols, or of lunatic asylums; because, though not actually authorized by the Act to demand such particulars of the past life, nor required by the same authority to furnish them, we felt that they might afford curious matter of illustration. They might, as we conceived, serve to show, out of a number of instances, the more prevailing causes of the poverty, the sickness, the crime, and the mental affliction to which each of these classes of public institutions minister. The result is, that in the tables that follow (pp. 62—71) we have been able to show the occupations originally pursued by more than half of the males above 20 years of age, now inmates of workhouses; of nearly a third of the female adults; and in all of nearly 24 per cent. of the in-door paupers of all ages and both sexes.

In the columns for hospitals there are only 254 out of 5081 male inmates above 20 years of age whose occupations are not here distinguished; and we have been able to give those of 7954 out of 10,448 persons of all ages and both sexes.

In gaols (criminal and debtors') the occupations of more than 10,000 out of 14,000 adult males are distinguished, and nearly two-thirds of the whole numbers confined of all ages.

In Lunatic asylums greater difficulty was anticipated, inasmuch as from the nature of the case, inquiries made of the individuals there resident would in many instances be impossible; but by the ready assistance furnished by those persons who had the charge of them we are able to present an account of the occupations of one-half of those confined. The whole of these returns, as applicable to Great Britain generally, are here given in an alphabetical form; we also subjoin a classification, similar to that furnished for occupations generally; and as a mere statement of the numbers confined who had pursued any class of occupation would be deceptive, unless due reference were had to the prevalence of the same occupations among those outside the walls of these abodes of want, pain, crime, and mental disease, we have in each case added to the per-centage which each occupation bears to the total numbers within these institutions, a similar calculation of proportions for the inhabitants of the United Kingdom.

The facts furnished by these latter returns might lead to many curious questions as to the class of occupations or pursuits which more particularly tend to furnish inmates for these institutions. We might instance many occupations of which a far greater proportion is found within these walls, than would be exhibited outside them by a similar calculation of proportions; such questions, however, would be of too speculative a nature and too alien from the duties entrusted to us.

(c) Considerable difficulty has occurred in ascertaining the number of Clergymen in England and Wales correctly, in consequence of the word "Clerk" being equally applicable to Clergymen and to the large class of persons employed by Bankers, Merchants, and professional men. The above results have been arrived at after a careful examination and correction of the totals returned under these heads in the several counties.

Conclusion.

We cannot conclude without noticing with regret the death of the late Registrar-General, Mr. Lister, who originated the machinery of the Act of Parliament under which we have acted, and was associated with us in this Commission, but did not survive to see its labours completed. By his death we have lost the valuable assistance of a talented colleague, while the public have been deprived of the illustrations which he might have added to the subject before us.

We here close what we have to offer in explanation and illustration of the pages that follow; they teem with materials for deciding upon many questions which have already divided, or may hereafter interest, the different parties in this country.

Our only object has been to arrange them in such a shape as should render them most accessible to all.

With reference to various questions, and in support of particular views, many modes of classification might be suggested which would be not the less curious and interesting because they could not be carried out with an absolute and scientific degree of accuracy; such attempts, however, would, as we feel, be here misplaced, and may be safely left to the industry and ingenuity of others who have in these pages ample materials placed within their power, and can use them without any official scruples to check their speculations.

EDMUND PHIPPS.
THOMAS VARDON.

(a) The Army abroad and in Ireland on the night of the 6th June 1841, amounted to 89,230 men.

(b) Considerable difficulty has occurred in ascertaining these numbers correctly, in consequence of the word "Clerk" being equally applicable to clergymen, and to the large class of persons employed by bankers, merchants, and professional men. The above results have been arrived at after a careful examination and correction of the totals returned under these heads in the several counties.

(c) Considerable difficulty has occurred in ascertaining the number of Clergymen in England and Wales correctly, in consequence of the word "Clerk" being equally applicable to Clergymen and to the large class of persons employed by Bankers, Merchants, and professional men. The above results have been arrived at after a careful examination and correction of the totals returned under these heads in the several counties.

PREFACE.

Occupation Abstract.

THE third volume of our Abstract contains an alphabetical arrangement of all the occupations carried on by the inhabitants of this kingdom, of whatever age or sex, on the 7th of June, 1841, from the personal communications of each individual or head of a family. There are separate returns (distinguishing the sex, and whether above or under 20 years of age) for every county in Great Britain and for all the larger towns, and these are afterwards combined for England and Wales, for Scotland, and for Great Britain generally.

The difficulties attendant upon making such an abstract of the occupations of the people of this kingdom, will not perhaps at first occur to persons who see it arranged in its present easy form of reference for all: when stated, however, they will at once account for the time and labour required for its completion. Upon the only former occasion when a return of occupations was made, certain lists, which were supposed to embrace all the trades then carried on, were furnished to the different overseers, to be by them filled up with the number of males upwards of 20 years old in each parish or place who were employed in retail trade, or in handicraft, as masters, shopmen, journeymen, apprentices, or in any capacity requiring skill in the business, while there was reserved to them the liberty of adding the names of such additional occupations as were not included in their lists. It will be seen that by this mode the tabular arrangement with the proper numbers so engaged was complete for each parish or place at the time these lists were returned by the overseers, and therefore easily arranged or combined so as to exhibit totals for counties or for towns.

The objection to this plan, however, was, that there was a want of uniformity in the apportionment and designation of occupations not included in those lists, and that as to the correctness of that part of the classification which was left to the discretion of the overseers, no adequate test could be afterwards applied. As the lists of 1831 refer to males only of the age of 20 years and upwards, great care must be observed in using them as a test of the comparative increase of different trades or pursuits in the various localities within the last decennial period. In illustration of the differences of system to which we have alluded we reprint (at p. 27) from the Abstract of 1831 the accounts of the persons engaged in trade and handicraft as applicable to Great Britain generally, and to the assumed limits of the Metropolis at that period (p. 46), together with our Summary of Occupations for Great Britain, and an account which we have prepared for the Metropolis as existing in 1841 (p. 48), the limits of which, although rather more extensive than those comprised in the account for 1831, will not cause such a variation as materially to affect the comparison. Upon the present occasion, instead of circulating lists to contain by anticipation every existing trade or calling, the enumerator was directed to insert each man's description of himself opposite his name, so that when the enumerators' schedules were returned to us we might arrange the whole upon such form as should be most easy of reference. The result was, that many occupations were returned that will not be found in the list of 1831, while in the instance of important manufactures minute subdivisions of labour were separately entered in the schedules, showing both the attention with which this part of their duty was performed by the enumerators, and the absolute necessity for after combination upon some uniform system. In the cotton manufacture alone of the county of Lancaster, there were more distinct heads of labour inserted in the enumerators' schedules (some of them identical, some of them merely indications of the immense subdivision that here exists) than the whole number of occupations of every kind that had in 1831 been allotted to that county. The total number of different terms, all of which finally had to be transferred to the head of cotton, amounted originally to 1255, while the whole number of distinct occupations returned for Great Britain in 1831 amounted only to 598.

Some difficulty was found in arriving at the numbers respectively employed in the manufacture of the principal textile fabrics, owing to the immense variety of designations given to the various subdivisions of labour, some of them being common to more than one fabric, such as winder, piecer, &c. This difficulty was met, however, by a careful reference to the prevailing manufacture of the districts in which they were enumerated, and, where necessary, by actual inquiries. We have just stated that the different titles under which the various persons employed in cotton manufacture for Lancashire were returned, amounted to 1255: these, for the convenience of publication, and in order to render them accessible to an ordinary enquirer, we have reduced in the county abstracts to the general heading of "Cotton manufacture, all branches." If we had published the numbers under the different subdivisions returned to us, not only would reference to other matters have been rendered more difficult by the alphabetical list being immensely extended, but those who wished to arrive at general results would have been deceived by omitting to notice branches of the manufacture with which nothing but a scientific knowledge of details could have made them acquainted.

For the woollen manufacture of the West Riding of Yorkshire, 117 different subdivisions of labour were returned to us, including such general terms as carders, rovers, setters, cleaners, and winders, as well as technical terms, such as billy-piecers, raisers, shoddy-teazers, stretchers, dryers, &c.

In the cotton manufacture, the designations common to those employed upon other textile fabrics, such as sliverers, slubbers, devillers, sweepers, piecers, &c., were mixed up with those more peculiar to this branch, such as batters, scutchers, scavengers, &c. If these had been returned separately in the alphabetical index, they would have been either overlooked or confounded with the trade or calling from which these subdivisions of labour have borrowed such terms as scavenger, sweeper, &c.

With respect to trades, we should mention that the numbers opposite to such trades as bakers, butchers, haberdashers, &c., do not represent (as is the case with commercial directories) only the total number of shops of these respective denominations, but also include all persons (distinguishing age and sex) who are employed in these particular trades. It is evident, however, that such a mode of return furnishes an exact idea of the relative importance in a social point of view of each trade, and gives more correctly the amount of business in each locality, inasmuch as the number of hands employed is a better test upon these points than could be furnished by a mere statement of the number of shops open.

In some cases the accuracy of returns of this kind has been impugned, in consequence of the small numbers returned as engaged in making or selling articles of very general consumption. Thus, the assertion that any large place contains but one spectacle-maker, two pork-butchers, three coffin-makers, or four hatters, has been quoted as incorrect or ridiculous; whereas it should be borne in mind, that only in places of such importance and commercial activity as to require and support great subdivision of trades, would any such occupations be separately carried on at all. In many small country towns, the spectacle-maker would merge in the optician, who would perhaps be also the watch-maker, the barometer-seller, and the bell-hanger of his neighbourhood. The coffin-maker would be doing the last offices to his former customers in the cabinet-making line; while the hatter would figure in the list as draper, grocer, bookseller, or shopkeeper, according as he might prefer one name to the other.

With respect to the term "Independent," we should premise that the numbers included under that head are not merely the wealthy, or even those in easy circumstances, but all who support themselves upon their own means without any occupation. It will, therefore, afford no test of the relative amount of wealthy persons in different localities, or throughout Great Britain, as while it includes in the more rural districts many poor widows or aged men living upon their savings, it omits many large capitalists who are returned under their proper heads in the list of "Occupations."

The return "Other Persons" includes many who, there is reason to believe, escaped enumeration upon other occasions, inasmuch as it comprises 22,303 persons ascertained to have been sleeping in barns, tents, pits, and in the open air, on the night of the 6th June, 1841. Of the occupations of these persons it was obviously impossible to procure any account, although we have been able to distribute them under the columns of sex and age. The same may be said of the 5,016 persons enumerated as travelling by night at the time the Census was taken.

The "Residue" of the population whose occupations are entirely unaccounted for amounts to 10,991,382, which would at first appear to be a large proportion. It must however be remembered, that this comprehends both sexes and all ages; and it will be found, upon examination, that of this number only 2½ per cent. are males above 20 years of age. The males under 20, and the females above and under 20, make up respectively about 31, 32, and 33 per cent. of the remainder. For the large number under 20 of each sex, without any occupation, it is obviously easy to account, comprehending, as it does, infants and children of tender age. The number of women above 20 years of age, without any occupation returned, consists generally of unmarried women living with their parents, and of the wives of professional men or shopkeepers, living upon the earnings but not considered as carrying on the occupations of their husbands. The small number of males above 20 years of age who have been returned by the Enumerators as not pursuing any occupations (nor as being persons of independent means, nor as paupers), amounting to 272,732, in a population of 18,655,981 souls (a proportion of only 1·46 per cent.), may be supposed to consist of sons who continue to reside with their parents, and perhaps to assist in their business, without being returned as carrying on the same trades; of husbands supported by the labour and industry of their wives; and of persons temporarily out of employment.

We do not think any further observations will be necessary for the correct comprehension of that portion of these Returns which is comprised in the Alphabetical Lists which form the bulk of this Volume.

Before proceeding to explain the reasons and the nature of the classification which we have attempted of the Occupations of the people of this Kingdom, we would shortly notice the effect which the increased or diminished preponderance of the two great classes, viz., the Manufacturing and Agricultural, may be supposed to have upon the vital statistics of this kingdom. It must be obvious that there is not any point connected with this important science, whether it be the space or the house accommodation enjoyed by its inhabitants, their mortality or fecundity, the rate of their natural or ascertained increase, nor, indeed, any other question of a similar nature, which is not directly or indirectly affected by the proportion which the Agricultural bears to the other great division of the community. To illustrate this subject, and in order to show the mutual bearing of the information furnished in our present and former returns upon those of the Registrar-General, we have prepared the following Table. The views suggested by each of these publications are so intimately connected, and so curiously illustrate each other, that we thought such a Table would be useful, in which the eye could range from one fact to the other, as applicable to each county in England, to North and South Wales, and to England and Wales generally.

TABLE showing to a given Number of Inhabitants the Number of Acres; the Average Annual Number of Marriages, Births, Born out of the County in which they were enumerated. Also the actual and assumed Increase of Population resulting from Rate of Infant Mortality, and the Proportions of Persons engaged in Agriculture and Trade respectively, for each County in

* As per Annual Report of the Registrar-General for 1843.

A few words of explanation as to each column may facilitate the comprehension of the mass of figures embraced by this Table.

Column 1 gives the number of inhabitants to every hundred acres for each county, and exhibits a state of things which alternately results from, or is a cause of, the different facts exhibited by the other columns. In counties where the inhabitants are employed not only in cultivating the natural products of the surface, as in the purely agricultural districts, but in modifying by various manufacturing processes the raw products of other regions, and extracting the treasure that lies concealed beneath the surface of our own, the number of inhabitants within a given space must be expected to be greater: thus it will be seen that while Hereford would furnish only 20 inhabitants to every 100 acres, Lincolnshire 21, Rutland 22, and the North Riding of Yorkshire but 15, Stafford would show 67, Chester 58, the West Riding of Yorkshire 70, Lancaster 147, and Middlesex 873.

The greater crowding of the inhabitants is by some supposed necessarily to lead to a greater number of marriages, of births, and of deaths.* Columns 2, 3, and 4, supply particulars on this head, by which the extent or universality of this consequence may be tested. It has, however, and with great appearance of plausibility, been urged, that no excessive mortality can be inferred until due allowance has been made for the excess of infant lives, which must, by a natural consequence, greatly swell the amount of deaths; column 5, therefore, has been added, in order to furnish for each county the proportion under five years of age in every 10,000 inhabitants.

In balancing the number of births against the inhabitants of any given division, a great error is committed unless due reference be had to the proportions there residing of a marriageable age, that is to say, between the years most likely to increase the population. Columns 6, 7, 8, and 9, give therefore the very varying numbers of each sex between 20 and 30, and between 30 and 40 years of age, in each of the counties of England; and in order not to omit the influence which a large preponderance above the usual age of marriage may be supposed to possess, column 10 contains a similar account of those above 50. It will thus be seen, that while Dorset would have, to every 20,000 inhabitants, 3200 of both sexes between 20 and 30 years of age, Monmouth would have 4000, and Middlesex rather more. On the other hand, the North Riding of York would furnish 3400 above 50; while the proportion of that age in Lancashire to the same numbers would not amount to 2200.

Column 11 shows the state of inhabited house-accommodation throughout England, a matter of no slight influence on the comfort, health, and habits of the population, ranging as it does from 2080 down to only 1100 houses to 10,000 inhabitants.

As we are now approaching the column which furnishes our account of the actual decennial increase of the population and its local distribution, we have thought it right to precede it by a tabular view, in columns 12, 13, and 14, of the number of persons born out of the several counties, in order to exhibit correctly the large influence which immigration has upon the account of the actual increase furnished in column 15.

To this we have added, in column 16, from the Registrar-General's Report for 1841, a statement of what would apparently have been the increase, supposing it had been influenced merely by natural causes, viz., by the excess of births over deaths. It will be seen, by comparing these two columns, which are placed side by side, that in counties in which the greatest apparent increase has taken place, according to our return, the real increase from the natural causes to which we have alluded has been very little above that for all England; while in other counties, in which the actual numbers have remained very nearly stationary for 10 years, the births have, in each year, far exceeded the deaths, and the surplus population has been apparently drained off to other localities by immigration.

It will not fail to be remarked, that the result of this comparison for all England is, that while the ascertained increase is nearly 14½ per cent., the natural increase at the present rate would appear to be not quite 10 per cent. in ten years. As this difference can, of course, in no way be accounted for by immigration from county to county, there appear to be only three modes of resolving the difficulty, each of which, or all combined in various degrees, may be adopted for that purpose. 1st. The immigration into England from Ireland and Scotland may be greater than the emigration from England to the colonies. In support of this it may be remarked, that the ascertained increase for Scotland is much less than that for England; and that this is still more the case with the Returns for Ireland, although there is no reason to suppose that the natural increase is in the same ratio less,—a point upon which no certain decision can be formed for want of a civil registry of births, deaths, and marriages in those parts of the United Kingdom similar to that in force for England and Wales. 2nd. The difference shown by the result of this table may be caused by the registry of births being more defective than that of deaths. Many reasons may be suggested why this should be the case,—the most obvious being that of illegitimate births, where numerous motives concur for avoiding registration if possible, while the registrar is less likely to be able to detect the omission. Indeed it is so well known that the registry of births was very greatly deficient in 1838, that on this account that year has not been brought into calculation in this table, as far as regards the births. The third reason that may be assigned why the excess of births over deaths, as shown in the last four years, should not, when spread over 10 years, furnish the increase exhibited by the Census Returns, is, that the increase might have gone on at a greater rate during the former than it did in the latter portion of the decennial period. There is no doubt that the period immediately preceding that at which the Census was taken was one of considerable depression in almost every branch of industry, and that the distress thereby engendered may have unduly increased the mortality, and therefore lowered the rate of natural increase, cannot be denied.

Columns 17, 18, and 19, furnish for both sexes an account of the comparative prevalence of early marriages for every county of England, and will perhaps cause some surprise from its not exhibiting that excess of imprudence upon this point, in the busy seats of commercial activity, that might have been expected. Indeed, with one or two exceptions, the agricultural counties take the lead in this particular.

Columns 20, 21, and 22, while they profess to give merely the number of persons of both sexes who signed the marriage register with marks, may be considered to present a fair criterion of the state of education in every county of England, inasmuch as those signing the marriage register would embrace all ranks and classes from the age at which education (at least elementary education) is generally completed.

Columns 23 and 24 are intended to illustrate the statistics of infant mortality in different localities. A mere account of the proportionate number of infant deaths to the total population must necessarily be deceptive and lead to incorrect conclusions, if made a test of the comparative prevalence or extent of infant mortality—inasmuch as where there are more infants born to the total population, even supposing the rate of infant mortality were equal, there must necessarily be also more infant deaths. A mere statement of the total number of deaths must also be deceptive as an index of the general mortality, if no reference be made to the excess of infant mortality. These two columns are intended to test the extent of both these influences, and to guard against either of these errors. The former contrasts the total number of registered infant deaths within a year, with the births registered within the same period. The second shows the proportion which the infant deaths bear to the general mortality.

The next three columns (25, 26, and 27) show the same facts as are exhibited in 2, 3, and 4, but in a different form, and it was considered convenient to append them here for the sake of more easy comparison with the columns immediately preceding them.

We have throughout this table given the results in proportions and per centages, and not in absolute numbers, because the limits of the counties referred to in the Census Returns and in the Registration Abstracts are not identical. This want of identity will not however be of so great importance where comparative proportions merely are noticed. Still it is evident, that as we often find neighbouring counties varying very much in the mortality attributable to each, the transfer of large numbers from one to another must to a certain degree affect these variances.

Lastly, in columns 28 and 29 are given proportional tables of the two great classes of occupations, viz., Agricultural, and Commercial (or Trade and Manufactures). In the former are included all farmers, graziers, nurserymen, &c., together with the whole number of persons returned as agricultural labourers; in the latter, all shopkeepers and manufacturers, with those working under them; while from both classes are excluded those returned as domestic servants or general labourers, together with all professional persons. It will be seen, that for all England trade and manufacture includes rather more than double the numbers included under the head of agriculture. The agricultural class forms not quite 8 per cent. of the whole population, while trade and manufacture employ $16\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. The proportions of course vary very much in the different counties; and it may be a curious study to view these variations in connexion with the facts exhibited by the preceding columns, in each of which the effects of those variations may be more or less traced. The greatest difference occurs in Lancashire and Middlesex, in which the manufacturing and trading column includes respectively 28 and 20 per cent. of the whole population, and the agricultural only 3 and 1 per cent. respectively. The difference between the two classes is least in the counties of Bedford, Dorset, Hertford, Norfolk, Northampton, Salop, and Southampton, in all of which the division is very nearly equal. The only counties in which the per centage engaged in agriculture greatly exceeds that employed in trade and commerce, are the counties of Essex, Hereford, Huntingdon, Lincoln, and Rutland; and in none of these does the difference amount to $6\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; while the excess in the columns of trade and manufactures ranges from 10 per cent. up to 25 per cent. in the counties of Chester, Derby, Lancaster, Leicester, Middlesex, Nottingham, Stafford, Warwick, and the West Riding of York.

The altered proportion which the agricultural bears to the commercial classes for Great Britain generally, will at first perhaps excite surprise. The proportions which the agricultural, the commercial, and the miscellaneous classes bore to each other, were, in

while they were respectively in

1841	22	46	32

It should be noticed that these comparative statements refer in the three first decennial periods to families, but upon the present occasion to individuals. The latter mode gives a more accurate view of the amount of employment afforded in each division of labour; but inasmuch as there are rather more of the younger branches of a family employed in trade and manufactures than in agriculture, it may have slightly augmented the difference here exhibited. The other facts shown by these returns are however so much in accordance with these results as to confirm their accuracy. The increase of the population generally in the agricultural counties is very small, while in the manufacturing and mining seats of industry it far exceeds that of England generally.

It is also obvious, that while the natural limits of the extent of land in cultivation must restrict the numbers returned as cultivating it, the unlimited nature of the supplies afforded of the produce of other countries must make the extent of demand the only measure of the number of hands that may be employed commercially in converting the raw material into the articles required for clothing or luxury, and in disposing of them, when converted, among home and foreign customers. So also the extent of surface is no test of the depth to which the labours of the enterprising miner may be directed; and it is a curious fact that in some counties there are more labourers employed in bringing up and rendering available the hidden treasures concealed below, than can be profitably employed in cultivating the surface.*

The total number of agricultural labourers in Great Britain, of both sexes, amounts (as will be seen in the Classification) to 1,138,563, being the largest number returned under any one head, except domestic servants, who amount to 1,165,233.† It is a curious fact, that the total number of both sexes included under these two heads is, in localities varying much as to other circumstances, pretty nearly the same. It must be matter for congratulation that so large a number of females as 908,825 should be comprehended in a class in which habits of steady industry, of economy, and of attention to the maintenance of good character are so necessary as that of domestic service.

Of tradesmen and handicraftsmen, by far the largest number are included under the head of boot and shoemakers, amounting in the whole to 214,780, or nearly one-third more than the butchers, bakers, buttermen, milkmen, grocers, and greengrocers put together.

It was important to ascertain correctly the numbers employed upon the staple articles of manufacture of this kingdom, inasmuch as in the absence of any official Returns upon this point (except those of the Factory Commissioners), the estimates of persons qualified to judge and to arrive at correct conclusions have varied very greatly. The numbers employed in and about the manufacture of cotton have been estimated much beyond, and as far below the truth. It will be seen by the following table (p. 16) that the actual number, including men, women, and children, returned under that head, amounts to 302,376.

To the numbers included strictly under the head of cotton manufacture, might be added as employed upon this fabric in its more advanced stages most of those here returned under the head of "lace" and "hose;" if to these be added the fair proportion of those who appear under the general heads of weavers, spinners, and factory-workers (fabric not specified), we may fairly assume the numbers to whom the cotton manufacture furnished employment in Great Britain was near upon half a million in June 1841. And this, be it remembered, was a period of great depression in this branch of trade, and when many large establishments were closed.

In order to give a general view of the relative importance of the different staple manufactures with reference to the number of hands employed, we have prepared the following table, in which we have allotted to each fabric its fair proportion of the total number of persons here returned under the general appellation of weaver, spinner, and factory-worker, (fabric not specified):—

* In the county of Durham the number of miners is nearly double that of the labourers employed in the cultivation of the surface.

† We have reason to believe that, in some instances, servants kept in farm-houses, and employed generally about the premises, have been returned as domestic servants, whereas in 1831 such persons were included as agricultural labourers. Our directions were very precise on this point, as all farm-servants were to be returned as agricultural labourers; still, we believe, that a want of proper attention to this direction has, in the agricultural counties, increased the return of domestic servants and diminished that of agricultural labourers. The cause here alluded to will account for there being on the face of the returns a slight decrease in the number of persons engaged in agriculture as compared with 1831, whereas we believe the fact to be (after making due allowance for the circumstance above stated) that there has been a small increase.

It is gratifying to see that the returns as to sex and age will afford consolation to those who have regretted the supposed preponderance of the weaker sex and of more tender youth in the number of persons employed in these manufactures. Under the head of cotton manufacture (all branches), comprehending, as we have already mentioned, 302,376 persons, the males above 20 years of age are more than double the number under 20, and considerably exceed the total number of females above 20 years of age, who, in their turn, exceed by a third the females under 20. It is also an additional satisfaction to add, that the proportion of very young persons employed appears to be progressively diminishing, as the last detailed returns on this subject, viz., those furnished by the Factory Commissioners, show a continued improvement in this respect.

In 1835 the number of persons under 13 years of age employed in factories upon the four staples of cotton, wool, silk, and flax, amounted to 55,455, and were reduced in 1839 to 33,566, being a reduction of 21,889, although the numbers employed of all ages had increased from 355,373 to 423,626, showing a transfer of employment from the young to the old, and that this could be done with a considerable extension instead of entailing a diminution of the business carried on.

So lately as January 15, 1844, Mr. Saunders, Inspector of Factories for the Yorkshire district, says the increase in the number of young persons and adults is greater than in the number of children. Mr. Howell, in his report for the same quarter, p. 18, for the Cheshire and Midland Counties, says it might be worthy of notice, that the few factories in which children under 13 years of age continue to be employed, are chiefly isolated in rural districts or in non-manufacturing towns. Mr. Saunders, in his report for the quarter preceding, gives a very favourable view of the proportionate increase of numbers as follows:—

Total numbers employed in 1838 . . .	95,000
Ditto . . . 1843 . . .	106,500
Increased number . .	11,500

The proportion in which this increase is divided among the three classes recognized by the Factory Act, viz., adults or persons above 18 years of age, young persons or those between 13 and 18, and children under 13 years of age, is as follows:—

Increase of adults	12,000
Ditto of young persons	1,500
	13,500

which is reduced to the actual increase, namely, 11,500, by a positive decrease in the number of children amounting to 2,000.

It may then be inferred that the expression of public opinion and the judicious interference of the legislature have not been without their effect. In the woollen manufacture the number of adult males employed is three times as great as that of the adult females, while the number of either sex under 20 years of age is comparatively small: the same may be said of the hose, but in the flax and linen manufactures the preponderance is not quite so great. In silk the numbers of both sexes employed are nearly equal, the excess among adults being with the males, and under 20 with the females. The manufacture of lace is the only one in which the number of females is very much greater than that of males; and here no one can be surprised at finding that the touch of a female hand is preferred in a material so fragile and delicate.

The return "Weavers, spinners, and factory workers (fabric not specified)," exhibits the same state of things. The males are, in round numbers, 99,000; the females, 63,000; adults of both sexes, above twenty years of age, 122,000; under twenty, 40,000. It will not fail to be remarked that the term "under 20" (which is the classification we were desired to make), comprehends many to whom the objections against infant labour can by no means be applied. The total number of persons employed upon the textile fabrics, forming the staple manufactures of the country, may be stated at 453,381 males, and 346,865 females. Those above 20 years of age, of both sexes, may be put at 555,191; those under twenty, at 245,055.

The following Tables show the number of persons employed respectively in mines, and in the manufacture and working of metals:—

It will be seen that the number of persons employed under ground in mines amounts to 193,825, being nearly equal to an eighth of the total numbers employed in the cultivation of the surface. Of these by far the largest proportion, namely, 118,233, are returned as engaged in coal mines, and only 10,949 in iron mines. It must be remembered, however, that these two minerals run in close neighbourhood together, and are worked more or less constantly with reference to the extent of the demand, so that the same men are transferred from time to time to one or the other. At the period of the Census there was considerable depression in the iron trade, while it was taken just at the period when the larger coal-merchants throughout the kingdom were laying in their stocks, and when the carrying trade for sea-borne coal was most active. This will in some degree account for a greater disproportion than might otherwise have been expected in these two branches. It should also be noticed that there are 31,173 persons returned under the general head of miners, who would most likely represent many usually employed in iron mines, but temporarily out of employ. The manufacture of iron from the raw material gives employment to nearly 30,000 persons.

The potteries and the large glass manufactories support, it will be seen, a population of 32,200, in the proportions of 24,600 and 7,600, and are principally carried on in the counties of Stafford, Worcester, Salop, Derby, Northumberland, and in the West Riding of York.

The manufacture of gloves is principally carried on by females, and, according to our returns, embraces in all not quite 10,000 persons; it is more particularly pursued in the counties of Leicester, Nottingham, Oxford, and Worcester.

The manufacture of engines and machines, which of course varies in activity and extent with the general activity of trade and manufacture, is daily increasing in importance from the demands upon it made by the railways extending in every direction. There are 16,550 persons returned as employed upon this important branch, comprehending the most intelligent and best paid of persons, both as masters and handicraftsmen.

We are fully alive to the difficulty of adopting any mode of scientific classification which would give general satisfaction. It is for this reason that in the counties and large towns, where we had to distinguish age and sex, we restricted ourselves to an alphabetical arrangement which would give to all, by very simple combinations, the opportunity of making for themselves any arrangement they might prefer. There is so much difference of opinion as to the strict bounds of productive and unproductive labour, and upon every other element of scientific division, that, in almost any classification we could have adopted, we should have been considered by many to have gone on wrong principles, and to have committed errors of which the extent could not be either tested or corrected. Even for England and Wales, for Scotland, and for Great Britain generally, in the Classification (see Table facing p. 52) which we have thought it right to furnish, in order to give comparative results we have preferred keeping to the general terms used in ordinary parlance, giving the totals engaged in trade and manufacture, in agriculture, in military and naval pursuits, in the learned professions, in other employments of the educated of both sexes, in general manual labour, in the civil service of the Government, in parochial offices, and in domestic service. These, with the independent and the residue, both which latter terms have been already alluded to, and the accidental classes of paupers, lunatics, almspeople, and prisoners, exhaust the total population of this kingdom. We have supplied a key or Table (p. 53), showing in detail the occupations of persons included under each head in this classification, so that any person by referring to it may deduct from the totals given the number contributed by any particular head of occupation which he thinks misplaced in the class to which we have assigned it.

We would willingly have given a classification of the occupations of the inhabitants of Great Britain into the various wants to which they respectively minister, but in attempting this we were stopped by the various anomalies and uncertainties to which such a classification seemed necessarily to lead, from the fact that many persons supply more than one want, though they can only be classed under one head. Thus, to give but a single instance,—the farmer and grazier may be deemed to minister quite as much to clothing by the fleece and hides as he does to food by the flesh of his sheep and cattle.

One advantage in the classification we have here adopted, and which was not without its influence upon our decision, is, that by a combination of some of the classes which we have here kept distinct, we are enabled to present the following comparative statement of the numbers included under each of the classes that were separately distinguished in the year 1831, and the same classes in 1841:—

COMPARATIVE STATEMENT of the Occupations of Males Aged 20 Years and upwards, enumerated in Great Britain, in the Years 1831 and 1841.

† This Column includes (for the sake of comparison with 1831) Fishermen, Boatmen, and Watermen.

‡ The total of Males in 1841 whose occupations are unaccounted for is, in fact, only 276,868, as it includes the following persons, who amount together to 115,343; viz. Males twenty years of age in the Government Civil Service 16,049, Parochial Police and Law Officers 22,942, Almspeople, Pensioners, Paupers, Lunatics, and Prisoners 73,539, and Army and Navy (Half-pay) 2,813.

As we feel that for the purpose of comparing the state of facts exhibited by different districts, or that shown by the whole kingdom at different periods, a mere statement of the numbers comprehended under each head in our classification is insufficient, we have prepared tables which should exhibit the comparative numerical importance of each class upon the principle of per centages, the only convenient mode for such a purpose. We have made the calculation upon two principles;—first, upon the total occupations returned; and, secondly, upon the whole population. The former shows the relative numerical importance of one industrial class as compared with all the others, the latter as compared with the whole population.

Although we have in our general classification combined under one head trade and manufacture, yet in the following table we have attempted to separate them in order to show the numbers they respectively embrace. In going through every occupation contained in our list for this purpose, we have felt the great difficulty of making such a division satisfactorily; we have therefore given (at p. 58) the names of all occupations included under each division exhibited in the following Abstract, in order to leave the opportunity of correction to those who differ from the view taken by us.

ABSTRACT distinguishing, as far as possible, the Number (with the Age and Sex) of Persons engaged in Commerce and Trade, from those engaged in Manufacture.

We thought it not unimportant to obtain, where feasible, returns of the former occupations pursued by persons who at the time of the Census were inmates of workhouses, of hospitals, of gaols, or of lunatic asylums; because, though not actually authorized by the Act to demand such particulars of the past life, nor required by the same authority to furnish them, we felt that they might afford curious matter of illustration. They might, as we conceived, serve to show, out of a number of instances, the more prevailing causes of the poverty, the sickness, the crime, and the mental affliction to which each of these classes of public institutions minister. The result is, that in the tables that follow (pp. 62—71) we have been able to show the occupations originally pursued by more than half of the males above 20 years of age, now inmates of workhouses; of nearly a third of the female adults; and in all of nearly 24 per cent. of the in-door paupers of all ages and both sexes.

In the columns for hospitals there are only 254 out of 5081 male inmates above 20 years of age whose occupations are not here distinguished; and we have been able to give those of 7954 out of 10,448 persons of all ages and both sexes.

In gaols (criminal and debtors') the occupations of more than 10,000 out of 14,000 adult males are distinguished, and nearly two-thirds of the whole numbers confined of all ages.

In Lunatic asylums greater difficulty was anticipated, inasmuch as from the nature of the case, inquiries made of the individuals there resident would in many instances be impossible; but by the ready assistance furnished by those persons who had the charge of them we are able to present an account of the occupations of one-half of those confined. The whole of these returns, as applicable to Great Britain generally, are here given in an alphabetical form; we also subjoin a classification, similar to that furnished for occupations generally; and as a mere statement of the numbers confined who had pursued any class of occupation would be deceptive, unless due reference were had to the prevalence of the same occupations among those outside the walls of these abodes of want, pain, crime, and mental disease, we have in each case added to the per-centage which each occupation bears to the total numbers within these institutions, a similar calculation of proportions for the inhabitants of the United Kingdom.

The facts furnished by these latter returns might lead to many curious questions as to the class of occupations or pursuits which more particularly tend to furnish inmates for these institutions. We might instance many occupations of which a far greater proportion is found within these walls, than would be exhibited outside them by a similar calculation of proportions; such questions, however, would be of too speculative a nature and too alien from the duties entrusted to us.

OCCUPATIONS, 1831.

(c) Considerable difficulty has occurred in ascertaining the number of Clergymen in England and Wales correctly, in consequence of the word "Clerk" being equally applicable to Clergymen and to the large class of persons employed by Bankers, Merchants, and professional men. The above results have been arrived at after a careful examination and correction of the totals returned under these heads in the several counties.

Conclusion.

We cannot conclude without noticing with regret the death of the late Registrar-General, Mr. Lister, who originated the machinery of the Act of Parliament under which we have acted, and was associated with us in this Commission, but did not survive to see its labours completed. By his death we have lost the valuable assistance of a talented colleague, while the public have been deprived of the illustrations which he might have added to the subject before us.

We here close what we have to offer in explanation and illustration of the pages that follow; they teem with materials for deciding upon many questions which have already divided, or may hereafter interest, the different parties in this country.

Our only object has been to arrange them in such a shape as should render them most accessible to all.

With reference to various questions, and in support of particular views, many modes of classification might be suggested which would be not the less curious and interesting because they could not be carried out with an absolute and scientific degree of accuracy; such attempts, however, would, as we feel, be here misplaced, and may be safely left to the industry and ingenuity of others who have in these pages ample materials placed within their power, and can use them without any official scruples to check their speculations.

EDMUND PHIPPS.
THOMAS VARDON.
